Haast suggested there had been a 'Great New Zealand Ice Period', when many large glaciers had deposited gravel and mud in large ridges (called moraines) or as fans in plains and valleys. By the late 20th century, scientists agreed that in the last 2.5 million years there have been more than 30 glacial periods worldwide.

New Zealand is part of a mostly submerged continent that broke away from the Gondwana supercontinent millions of years ago. As the new land moved into the Pacific Ocean, it gradually submerged, then was uplifted by activity in the earth's crust. New Zealand's geology records the story of the country's birth and growth.
